An article appeared in a Brooklyn newspaper two months ago giving a history of several notable cases of women who had left their mark in the world as adventuresses.

This article, which bore the signature of Inspector Byrnes, included a brief outline of the alleged history of the Claffin sisters, now married to Sir Francis Cooke, a wealthy Londoner, and J. B. Martin, a wealthy banker.

The inspector said he had no positive knowledge that either Mrs. Cooke or Mrs. Martin would bring suit against him, but he has seen some dispatches from them which pointed to such action. "It is true," said he, "that they have rented a house in this city, presumably for the purpose of giving them a status to enter the suit for libel. A sister and brother-in-law are now occupying the house." The inspector said that he had prepared for whatever might happen. TARANTULA AGAINST CENTIPEDE. Some Interesting Battles Between Venemous and Ferocious Creatures

From the San Diego Union. One afternoon last week there was a large and interested crowd of amusement seekers in and in front of the large side windows of Knox & Van Haren's drug store. Several days before two centipedes, one large and the other small, were brought into the store, and also a tarantula. They were left in separate recep- Richmond, Va.

tacles, and all alive. On this particular afternoon it was determined to see how the animals would act when placed together. A layer of sand, about an inch thick, was spread over the bottom of a glass globe and first the two centipedes were dropped in and with them a horned toad. His majesty with the horns took no part in the trouble which disturbed the other two. He seemed to be acting simply as the referee of the fight. The two centipedes crawled over him and rolled over him, but hardly awakened his sleepy nature. Not so the others. They circled two or three times around the globe and finally came in each other and the battle began. It was short, but it was exciting. No two pugilists ever went after each other with more vim or more apparent determination to doeach other harm than did these two centipedes. Their catlike claws were re-peatedly imbedded in each other's bodies, but the smaller one could not stand the strain, and when they came together for the third time, about two minutes after they were first put in, they clinched and wound about each other, keeping their claws going in scissor fashion centipede dropped out dead.

The body was taken out of the globe, and soon after the tarantula was dropped in. The centi-pede had not had time to recover any strength after his battle with his fellow, and his sting had lost its death-dealing qualities, so that this battle was also short. The two animals closed only twice when the forceps of the tarantula crushed through the head of the larger centipede, and he died quickly. The tarantula had apparently received no injury and looked mad enough to have fought a whole regiment of centipedes. One of the company who had watched the two battles, impressed with the way the centi-pede fought in the first battle, ventured the ssertion that the centipede was the better fighter. He knew where one could be obtained and he went after it; mean while the crowd waited. When he returned he brought a centipede nearly four and a half inches long. It was immediately dropped into the globe and the fight, which was then begun, lasted for fully three-quarters of an hour and was exceedingly savage while it lasted. The tarantula did most of the fighting, but after the first attack invariably got the worst of the round.

The tarantula fights with a pair of pincers which are thrust out just below or from the lower part of the head. These are very hard and strong enough to leave marks upon a lead pencil. The centipede fights with the double line of cat-like claws which are ranged in rows along the side of the body. In fighting the tarantula spreads himself out and, after backing away after the manner of a crawfish unti he can get no further, springs upon the enemy, thrusting out the pincers and grasping what-ever portion of the body of the enemy comes within reach. gether for a dozen or more rounds, breaking away and returning to the opposite side of the globe at the close of each. Finally the two ne together and the centipede seemed to get the hold he had been looking for and the tar-antula's body was quickly wrapped up in the fold of the armed body of its opponent. Mean-while the hundred claws of the centipede were working rapidly and with such effect that the life of the tarantula was soon over. The vicas the forceps of the tarantula had pierced hi body in five places, from which the black life fluid was running. He survived the battle only a few hours.
